Verifiable Credentials	Verifiable credentials (VCs) are the electronic equivalent of the physical credentials such as identity documents, qualifications, employment and training records.	Verifiable credentials (VCs) are the electronic equivalent of the physical credentials such as identity documents, qualifications, employment and training records. The VC model places the holder of a credential at the centre of the identity ecosystem, giving individuals control of their identity attributes. The VC model is a digital parallel to the way we use physical artefacts such as a licence, passport or university transcript. Such a model is decentralized and/or can communicate as a bridge with existing centralised identity frameworks whilst giving more autonomy and control to the participants.

Zero Knowledge Proofs	Zero Knowledge Proofs are a way to prove something is true without revealing the source data of the truth.	Zero Knowledge Proofs (ZKP) can be applied to authentication where no passwords are exchanged, which means they cannot be stolen. ZKPs allow you to prove that you know some secret (or many secrets) to somebody without revealing the secret/s. This technical approach would enable trusted entities, for example Your Bank to verify something about You, without giving up the details of Your banking relationship. Alternatively, Your Telco could confirm Your location, without revealing it for a location-based service. Meeco is developing the specific application of this technology to minimise the amount of data or information you are required to give up, and in particular to protect your identity.
